This feeling springs from a sincere democracy. But preaching Christianity to Jews has remained a sensitive area for all Jews, because over the centuries conversion was rarely a matter for individual feeling, but of yielding to intolerable social pressures. Israel stands for a national unity that, among other things, offers freedom from this particular pressure, and it is the more to be regretted that some churches in Israel have tended to make use of financial incentives in a search for potential converts.

This is, of course, not Mr. Graham's way. Even so, there are many who will doubt whether in the long run the most effective way of bringing an instanctivity was the main langed conversion.
